This provocative volume will inform scholars, teachers and students about contemporary trends in Muslim societies; Those interested in new developments in gender studies and the study of women and Islam will appreciate this useful volume.Lois Beck, Professor of Anthropology, Washington University, author of *The Qashqaï of Iran*Featured are such relevant topics as women's roles in reinterpreting Islam, the importance of understanding both religious and secular women's ideas and practices, the growth and growing importance of women's transnational ties and the importance for women of television and the internet. I recommend it to everyone to everyone interested in expanding and deepening their understanding of women in the Muslim world today.Nikki Keddie,

Professor Emerita of Middle Eastern and Iranian History, University of California, Los Angeles

I did not realize until I read this book how limited my perspectives were on women in the Muslim world, even as someone who pursues feminism in an academic setting. This book really does an excellent job of shattering the stereotypes that Western people, liberal or not, have about women in Muslim communities and under Islam. By using essays that speak from a variety of voices, it's able to show a plurality of experiences of women in Muslim communities, different ways of interacting with womanhood and feminism.
